

THE MANIFESTO

15 September 2026 — Tuesday

This is not a declaration that I am good.

It is not a declaration that I am evil.

It is a record of the person I have been, the person I became, the darkness I carry, and the person I refuse to become.

I. WHERE I CAME FROM

I was once a crybaby.

Innocent. Pure. Chubby. Socially awkward. Afraid. Not particularly brave. I struggled to socialize, struggled to speak in front of people, struggled to participate. While other children played during recess, I usually didn't.

Girls called me cute. They kissed my cheeks. I was, in my own strange way, a harmless little kid.

But boys were different.

I was bullied.

I didn't know how to fight back. I didn't have a weapon—not literally, but metaphorically. I had no strength, no confidence, no idea how to respond.

So I cried.

I cried through it.

And then, in the fifth grade, something happened.

I broke my arm.

I fell down the stairs at my aunt's house, hit the marble, and badly injured my elbow and biceps. For months, my body was forced into recovery.

But something else happened during those months.

Something inside me changed.

The day I realized I could barely perform two clean push-ups, I decided:

I would not remain the person I was.

I didn't know the terminology then.

I didn't know I was beginning a lifelong process of destroying an old version of myself and rebuilding another.

I simply knew:

I had to change.

II. THE FIRST TRANSFORMATION

My father eventually bought me my first 5 kg bag of protein.

I began training.

Home workouts. Again and again.

I became stronger.

Healthier.

More capable.

The training stayed with me.

Even now, years later, I still train.

That habit became more than fitness.

It became evidence.

Evidence that the person I am today does not have to remain the person I was yesterday.

My childhood also taught me something else:

I was capable.

Academically, I was never some perfect genius who topped everything, but I consistently remained among the stronger students through school. I enjoyed testing my intelligence. I became fascinated with IQ tests, eventually scoring within ranges I considered high.

But intelligence alone never satisfied me.

I wanted transformation.

I wanted proof.

I wanted to look at an older version of myself and know:

That person is dead.

Not literally.

But psychologically.

III. THE JEE YEARS — WHEN DISCIPLINE BECAME SELF-DESTRUCTION

Then came JEE.

I studied relentlessly.

12–14 hours a day.

No major coaching system carrying me.

School.

Tuition.

Mocks.

Studying alone.

Trying to hold everything together.

Eventually, my body paid the price.

Months of physical inactivity and extreme academic pressure destroyed my health.

Infections.

Low hemoglobin.

Food poisoning.

Weakness.

At my lowest, I was around 42 kg.

I could barely run.

Stairs could leave me breathless.

My body felt like a skeleton holding my soul.

I had spent months trying to build a future while neglecting the organism that had to carry me there.

I didn't get the outcome I wanted from JEE.

But something remained.

I had discovered that I could push myself far beyond what I previously believed possible.

I also learned the darker lesson:

Discipline without balance can become self-destruction.

I will remember both.

IV. REBUILDING AGAIN

College came.

Self-improvement came with it.

YouTube came.

Eventually, after many videos, I entered the world of looksmaxxing content.

And my appearance changed dramatically.

My body changed.

My face changed.

My style changed.

My confidence changed.

The boy who was once afraid to participate had become someone capable of putting himself publicly in front of strangers.

The boy who once couldn't fight his own battles learned how to fight himself.

Again and again.

That became my pattern:

Destroy → rebuild → evolve.

But somewhere along that journey, another transformation was happening.

The darkness I'd always felt inside me began becoming more conscious.

V. LOVE — THE PART OF ME I DIDN'T EXPECT

I have loved several times.

The first was a childhood crush.

We shared lunches.

I gave her the name "Shizuoka."

Years later, I found her Instagram.

I messaged:

"Do you remember me?"

She blocked me.

A ridiculous ending to my first love.

But I remember her.

Then there was the girl from fifth grade.

Intelligent.

Beautiful.

A topper.

Someone I genuinely admired.

I developed feelings for her, but discovered my best friend liked her too.

I interpreted it as betrayal.

Then confusion.

Then sacrifice.

I never knew whether my feelings were mutual.

Nothing happened.

We remained friends.

Then came the senior who teased me.

She would sit on my lap in the school bus and mess around with me.

I didn't understand what she wanted.

I reacted with anger.

I remember hurting her hand until she cried and begged me to stop.

I still don't fully understand that version of myself.

Then came the first girl I truly tried to love.

I changed my appearance for her.

Styled my hair.

Dressed differently.

Shared notes.

Eventually, I confessed.

She rejected me brutally.

An older guy connected to her threatened me.

I became terrified.

I blocked her.

She disappeared from my life.

And something inside me became ashamed of vulnerability.

I hated myself for having confessed.

I hated the feeling of needing someone.

I hated being exposed.

That was one of the first times I understood:

Love can make me feel powerless.

VI. THE TOXIC ERA

Later, in college, I became attached to another girl.

Looking back, I don't even fully understand why.

She wasn't good for me.

She was known to be toxic.

Yet I became obsessed.

I started doing things I now find embarrassing.

Simping.

Trying to impress her.

Even taking pictures of her through my friend's phone.

Looking back, I feel disgust toward that version of myself.

But then she unfollowed me.

And it didn't just hurt romantically.

Around the same period, my YouTube progress suffered.

Academics suffered.

My health suffered.

My mental state suffered.

It took me roughly a year to recover.

And during that recovery, something important happened.

I discovered gratitude.

I discovered self-improvement again.

Even while consuming blackpill ideas, I refused to completely surrender myself to them.

Instead, I turned self-hatred into fuel.

Not:

"I deserve to suffer."

But:

"I refuse to remain this version of myself."

That distinction saved me.

VII. THE DARK VARIANT

Somewhere in this period, I became fascinated with characters like Homelander.

Not because I literally wanted to become him.

But because I recognized something in the psychology:

Confidence.

Ego.

Dominance.

Fearlessness.

The refusal to feel small.

The ability to walk into a room as though the room belongs to you.

I began combining that mentality with the darker traits I'd always felt:

Self-hatred.

Envy.

Pride.

Competitiveness.

Anger.

Revenge.

The desire to prove myself.

For the first time, these things didn't feel entirely shameful.

They felt powerful.

I had spent years believing that being good meant eliminating everything dark inside me.

I began wondering whether that was wrong.

Maybe the answer wasn't suppression.

Maybe the answer was integration.

VIII. HER

Then came her.

I found her through a spam account.

Hundreds of people followed.

Very few followed back.

She was one of them.

At first, we simply shared reels.

Then messages.

Then conversations.

Eventually, she confessed that she had a crush on me.

And something changed.

For the first time, I didn't feel like I was chasing love.

Love had arrived.

She was 17.

I was 21.

The age difference and the fact that we'd never met in person made the situation complicated, and I know that reality must be treated seriously and responsibly.

But emotionally, what happened between us felt enormous.

She was different.

She was pure-hearted.

She had experienced difficult things in childhood.

She had a father I deeply respected.

She talked.

A lot.

And after years of silence, rejection, loneliness, and failed attempts at connection, I finally had someone whose voice I actually wanted to hear.

Her yapping became something I loved.

We shared everything.

Late-night conversations.

Video calls.

Thoughts.

Fears.

Plans.

Dreams.

For once, the person I had spent years trying to become didn't feel like a lonely person standing at the top of a mountain.

I felt peaceful.

She made the "devil" in me softer.

She made me want to be kind.

She made me want to protect.

She made me want to build.

Marriage was discussed.

Trips.

Children.

A home.

A future.

I started imagining a life instead of simply imagining myself.

And that frightened me in a way nothing else had.

Because now I had something to lose.

IX. THE NIGHT EVERYTHING CHANGED

She had been sick for weeks.

We thought it was something ordinary.

Eventually, she went home from her hostel.

Then came the night.

Around 1 AM.

She sent me her reports.

She had been diagnosed with a rare disease.

Goodpasture syndrome.

I was told it was incurable and that her doctors believed she might have only years left.

I broke.

Completely.

I cried for three days.

The last time I remember crying like that was years earlier.

It felt like someone had driven steel through my chest and pulled it backward and forward again.

I kept thinking:

Why her?

Why someone who had already suffered?

Why someone who had finally brought peace into my life?

Why now?

It felt almost cruel.

Like the universe had waited until I finally allowed myself to love something and then decided to show me exactly what it meant to have something taken away.

I don't want another girl.

I don't want a replacement.

I don't want some future version of myself to simply "move on."

I want her to survive.

I want her healthy.

I want her back to her normal life.

I want the future we imagined to remain possible.

I want her to live.

X. THE DARKNESS I FEAR

This is where this manifesto truly begins.

Because I discovered something terrifying about myself.

I have darkness inside me.

I feel it.

Envy.

Ego.

Pride.

Competitiveness.

Self-hatred.

Sadism.

Anger.

The desire for revenge.

The need to prove myself.

A hunger to become powerful enough that nobody could ever make me feel helpless again.

For years I believed these traits were simply evil.

So I suppressed them.

I tried to become the nice guy.

The good guy.

The morally acceptable guy.

But suppression did not destroy them.

It simply buried them.

Now I understand something:

I do not need to kill my darkness.

I need to master it.

XI. MY DARKNESS IS NOT MY MASTER

If the worst happens, there is a version of me I fear.

A version that becomes consumed by hate.

A version that stops caring.

A version that turns every wound into revenge.

A version that becomes narcissistic, ruthless, cold, calculating and obsessed with proving that he can never be powerless again.

I can imagine that person.

And yes—

part of me finds the idea powerful.

That is precisely why I must be careful.

Because there is a difference between:

being ruthless with myself

and being destructive toward others.

There is a difference between:

having violent thoughts

and

acting on them.

There is a difference between:

using anger as fuel
and becoming anger.

There is a difference between:

becoming powerful
becoming cruel.

I refuse to confuse them.

If my girl survives, I want to live.

If she doesn't, I will grieve.

I may change.

I may become colder.

I may become harder.

I may lose parts of myself.

But I will not turn another person's suffering into permission to destroy innocent lives.

My darkness belongs to me.

It does not own me.

XII. THE CODE

1. I WILL NOT SUPPRESS MYSELF.

I will acknowledge everything inside me.

The beautiful.

The ugly.

The childish.
The intelligent.
The insecure.
The arrogant.
The loving.
The jealous.
The ambitious.
The dark.

I will know myself completely.

Because what is unconscious controls you.

What is conscious can be controlled.

2. I WILL MASTER MY DARKNESS.

I will use envy to identify what I want.

I will use competitiveness to improve.

I will use pride to demand excellence.

I will use anger to create boundaries.

I will use pain to build resilience.

I will use rejection to become stronger.

I will use self-hatred carefully—not as a reason to destroy myself, but as a signal that something in me demands change.

And revenge?

I will transform revenge into achievement.

Nothing terrifies an enemy more than realizing they no longer matter.

3. I WILL NEVER AGAIN CONFUSE SUFFERING WITH STRENGTH.

I already learned this through JEE.

Destroying my body does not make me disciplined.

Starving myself of rest does not make me powerful.

Breaking myself does not prove anything.

Strength means being able to continue.

Not being unable to stop.

4. I WILL BUILD MY BODY.

My body is the physical foundation of everything else.

I will train.

I will eat.

I will recover.

I will become stronger.

Not because I hate the weak child I once was.

But because I respect how far he had to come.

5. I WILL BUILD MY MIND.

I will remain curious.

I will question.

I will learn.

I will not allow internet ideologies to become substitutes for thinking.

No blackpill.

No redpill.

No hero worship.

No villain worship.

No ideology gets to think for me.

I take information.

I test it.

I keep what is useful.

I discard what is false.

6. I WILL NOT BE A SLAVE TO VALIDATION.

I have chased affection.

I have chased approval.

I have changed myself for girls.

I have embarrassed myself for attention.

I have confused obsession with love.

I have confused rejection with worthlessness.

I will not do that forever.

Someone rejecting me does not make me inferior.

Someone choosing me does not make me superior.

My value cannot be outsourced.

XIII. LOVE

I once believed love made me weak.

Now I know something different.

Love made me human.

The girl I love exposed a part of me I had buried beneath years of self-improvement.

She made me want peace.

She made me want a future.

She made me want to care about someone besides myself.

Whatever happens, I will not consider loving her a mistake.

If she survives, I will cherish the life we get.

If she doesn't, I will carry what she gave me without allowing grief to consume everything else.

I will never use her suffering as an excuse to become a monster.

If anything, I will make sure that the love she gave me creates something good.

That will be part of her legacy in me.

XIV. WHAT I REFUSE TO BECOME

I refuse to become weak.

But I also refuse to become cruel merely because cruelty is easier.

I refuse to become a victim permanently.

I refuse to become dependent on validation.

I refuse to become an internet ideology.

I refuse to destroy my body in pursuit of greatness.

I refuse to let rejection define me.

I refuse to let envy control me.

I refuse to confuse narcissism with confidence.

I refuse to confuse fearlessness with recklessness.

I refuse to confuse masculinity with cruelty.

I refuse to become the monster I imagine simply because the monster feels powerful.

And most importantly:

I refuse to let tragedy decide who I become.

XV. WHAT I WANT TO BECOME

I don't want to become a saint.

I don't want to become a villain.

I don't want to become some fictional character.

I want to become myself—but fully realized.

Strong enough to protect.

Intelligent enough to understand.

Disciplined enough to execute.

Confident enough not to beg.

Ambitious enough to build.

Self-aware enough to recognize my own bullshit.

Kind enough to love.

Ruthless enough to walk away.

Dangerous enough that I never need to prove I'm dangerous.

Powerful enough that I don't need to abuse power.

And disciplined enough that my darkest instincts remain weapons in my hands rather than chains around my neck.

XVI. THE TWO PATHS

THE LIGHT VARIANT

She survives.

She gets treatment.

She returns to her life.

We continue.

I build my body.

I build my career.

I build my channels.

I create.

I travel.

I love.

I eventually build the family we once imagined.

And maybe one day I look back at this document and laugh at how terrified I was.

I hope for this future.

More than anything.

THE DARK VARIANT

Something happens to her.

The person who finally opened my heart disappears.

The grief changes me.

The softness disappears.

The anger returns.

The ego grows.

The envy becomes sharper.

The competitiveness becomes relentless.

The desire to prove myself becomes enormous.

I become colder.

More ruthless.

More detached.

More ambitious.

But even in that future—

I must remember this document.

Because the purpose of becoming powerful was never to become evil.

The purpose was to ensure that I would never again be powerless.

There is a difference.

XVII. THE TRUTH

Maybe none of these futures happen.

Maybe she survives completely.

Maybe medicine advances.

Maybe the diagnosis changes.

Maybe the prognosis was misunderstood.

Maybe we eventually separate naturally.

Maybe we stay together for decades.

Maybe I become someone completely different.

Maybe this entire manifesto becomes an artifact from a 21-year-old version of me who was terrified of losing the first person he truly loved.

I don't know.

Nobody does.

The future is fundamentally uncertain.

So I will not pretend that I know what I will become.

I only know what I choose today.

XVIII. MY DECLARATION

I came from weakness.

I learned strength.

I came from fear.

I learned courage.

I came from bullying.

I learned resistance.

I came from loneliness.

I learned attachment.

I came from rejection.

I learned self-reliance.

I came from physical weakness.

I learned discipline.

I came from failure.

I learned reconstruction.

I came from self-hatred.

I learned transformation.

I came from darkness.

I am learning integration.

And now I stand at the strangest point of my life:

I finally have something I genuinely love.

And I am terrified of losing it.

But fear does not get to write my future.

Grief does not get to write my future.

Anger does not get to write my future.

Envy does not get to write my future.

Society does not get to write my future.

I do.

XIX. THE FINAL RULE

I will never again try to become someone else.

Not the perfect good guy.

Not the perfect villain.

Not Homelander.

Not a saint.

Not a monster.

Not an internet archetype.

Not an idealized masculine character.

Not the person other people demand.

Me.

Everything inside me gets acknowledged.

Everything useful gets weaponized.

Everything destructive gets controlled.

Everything I love gets protected without becoming an excuse for destruction.

Every failure becomes information.

Every rejection becomes information.

Every wound becomes information.

Every victory becomes proof.

And every version of myself that no longer serves me—dies.

Not because I hate who I was.

But because I am responsible for who I become.

EPILOGUE

If you're reading this years from now, remember something.

You wrote this on:

Tuesday, 15 September 2026.

You were 21.

Your hands hurt from typing.

You were terrified for the girl you loved.

You had cried.

You were angry at God.

You were angry at life.

You were afraid of what grief might turn you into.

You could already imagine your darkest possible future.

But you were still hoping.

Still praying.

Still loving.

Still training.

Still building.

Still here.

So if you became stronger—remember why.

If you became successful—remember why.

If you became ruthless—remember the line between ruthlessness and cruelty.

If you became powerful—remember that power without control is weakness wearing armor.

And if she survived and you're reading this beside her someday—thank God.

Because that was the future you wanted more than any other.

And if life took another path—

remember:

You were never required to become a monster simply because the world hurt you.

You were allowed to become something harder.

Something wiser.

Something stronger.

Something capable of carrying darkness without becoming darkness.

THE LAST SENTENCE

I will not kill the darkness inside me.

I will teach it who is in charge.

And whatever happens next, I will keep moving forward.
